The Meeting Rooms

The meeting rooms situated on the first floor of Society house, overlooking Merrion Square to the front and a restored Georgian garden to the rear. Their marble fireplaces, elaborate ceiling decorations and tall, shuttered windows all reflect their former status as the main reception spaces of the house. The rooms are now used for meetings, receptions and presentations.

Facilities: Dining/boardroom table seating 20, Standing capacity of 80, Wireless internet access

The Garden

The garden of Society House is the only surviving Georgian townhouse garden in Dublin city. It has been fully restored to its original late 18th-century splendour, giving visitors a rare insight into the private lives of Dublin's affluent citizens over two hundred years ago. It provides an elegant setting for outdoor events, product launches and receptions. The mews of No. 63 has also been restored and is currently available as holiday accommodation, from the Irish Landmark Trust.

The Library

Laid out in 1918, our restored library houses a collection of books, journals and archive materials that document Ireland's human and built heritage from the most distant past to the present day. Gathered over 160 years and comprising more than 10,000 printed works, the collection includes Irish and international sources on archaeology, folklore and local history.

It also includes over 100,000 photographs and drawings of national importance. The library has an intimate ambience and setting ideal for evening events such as book launches and readings.
